

INDISCRIMINATE

Old wooden escalator rattles upwards, icy air howling in our faces
as we clutch the handrail tightly and hold our bags close to us.

Camden Town.

Rush hour.

Wet roads.

Dark.

Sainsbury's.

The railway bridge

(the North London Line that'll take us home later, if we run).
Dreary North London in dreary winter drizzle.

People choose to live here,

can you imagine -

It's cold inside, absolutely freezing.

There's a wood-fire and clean sawdust freshly laid on the floor,

and we huddle inside our jackets, pints held close.

(When I'm rich and famous I'll own this place and there'll be tea and coffee

and hot buttered scones -

but for now it's pints and peanuts, and I'm cold and I'm hungry and -

and I would brave cleaning my teeth

in the not-so wonderful toilets,

only I find I've forgotten the toothpaste, and -)

"Hello."

You speak my name and we both smile.

You're dressed in the same clothes,

or so it seems to me.

And here we are again.

This place again.

Here, where we first met,

me and you and your perfect smile,

and I fell in love, or tried to.

Wanted to - because it helps take my mind off things.

Because I needed to, and

you - you don't mind,

what does it matter to you,

you and your smile,

which I think of as false,

but which really is just indiscriminate.

(But - Jesus, why should you reserve it for me;

we only met the once,

Just, I wish you would.)

"A drink?"

"Oh, no thanks, I have one,"

gesturing to my pint on the table.

We smile again.

(We don't have anything to say to each other;

we don't know each other at all.

In a moment you'll amble off and speak to someone else.

Ah yes, price rises. These are due to: (A) the last lot of postage increases; (B) other things going up; (C) there goes one now, wheeee! BANG! (D) wow... (E) increased VAT from 1/4/91 to subsidise the Poll Tax, keep inflation down and encourage small businesses and people in general to have dainty, child-like feet; (F) untrammelled greed. I guess we're a sore disappointment to you. But then, you're so often a sore disappointment to us it seems only reasonable - you see, you're not just a faceless mass, seething, impersonal - no, we think of you almost as PEOPLE; I personally think of you as a rather nice young PE teacher named Barbara living on the Chandag Estate in Keynsham. And Barbara - YOU have especially disappointed me. Maybe my hopes flew too high; but oh you weren't like all the rest, with their Northside beer mats and James hymn-books no, you had a BRAIN, you had eyes that sparkled and shone, you EXCITED me with your endless possibilities, "you are like putty," I said, and you hit me, I bled all over your Inspiral Carpets dish-mop and yet still I clung like a limpet with hiccupps for I saw in you all of the things I'd ever wanted, bar a laser-printer and a sandwich-toaster, or preferably some combination of the two - someone would smile, and succour me softly when that was what I craved, a gentle Gretel to tend my woes should I stub my toe on Life's great trail of crumbs or snag my nose-ring on the trampoline springs - actually, what I really always wanted was a guinea-pig - I mean, I had one once, but it died really young; I don't mind talking about it; I'm not one of those men who's afraid of honest emotion - the sort who's shamed by a few discrete tears wiped away on the back of his hand if, with head sunk in palms in some sad hazy bar on the ring-road of some lonely town, he should recall - a fate-laden late June afternoon, deep in the Surrey hills... and the sky above us where we play drained away to the colour of uncooked scones and Hammy - I mean Gummy - suddenly takes a nasty thick edge from an awkward bounce, sails miserably up over backward short leg, and crashes through the summer-house roof - it WASN'T MY FAULT. Babs, honey, listen: they even made me PAY for that broken pane - from my pocket-money. Ah, WELL may you crumble helplessly, pull me to your bosom and soothe me with gently whispered kisses and strident demands that I remove the bulk of your clothing forthwith but - oh go on then, you are sweet, it may help a little.
