Um - we've moved. Only across Bristol, but that still means a new phone number - AND a fax line too, for those of you who can no longer bring yourselves to speak to us face-to-face, or who find famous people just a wee bit intimidating, like we used to. The PO Box number remains the same, but anyone still writing to the old Upper Belgrave Road address had better bloody well stop it. Ugh. Sorry - feeling a bit terse and argumentative this morning - don't know why, nothing to do with you (unless, of course, you're one of those people who couldn't be bothered voting in the local elections yesterday...)

ALSO - what with moving and then being awash with scaffolders and builders and General Elections and things, not much has been done in the way of actual WORK, and everybody's been waiting rather an unfunny amount of time for orders to arrive and um and um... you're not convinced... you think it's all just excuses... excuses... excuses... blip... blip...

Long ago, long before anything had ever really happened, this planet was invaded by a race of fabulous beings - weird, wonderful creatures, with angled necks and multi-tufted heads, whose mission was to build for themselves a new home here on Earth, based loosely upon their own planet, but without all the silly annoying bits. So surveys were made and plans planned, till at last they were ready to begin. First off, they shot all the dinosaurs. Then, feeling a bit guilty, they buried them under rocks and hoped everyone would forget about them which, by and large, they did.

- and then arose whole cities, and homes with every comfort and -
- after a few years, some of them got up again and began to pitter about. They smiled reassuringly at their neighbours. "Nice here, isn't it," they thought to each other, "quiet. Not like back home, with all that dreadful..." - but somehow none of them could ever quite remember what it was that had been so dreadful. And then finally one day, one of them woke up and thought: "I'm bored." And all his neighbours came round and beat him to pulp. "No you're bloody bored!" they chorused. Then they hid him under a rock. But that word "bored" hung heavy in the air...

"I think the problem," sighed one while hopping home, "is that we're basically a war-loving species who thrive on violence. And all these dopey animals" - he gestured off-handedly with his front arm at a sad little group of woolly rhinos listlessly prodding each other with sticks in a nearby hollow - "are completely wet and useless. At least the dinosaurs used to tread on us. At least there was some skill involved."

So the proposal was put that, given life really was boring as hell right now, the entire race be simply placed in cryogenic suspension and evolution allowed to run its slow dreary course until some new species with a bit of brain and grasp of basic strategy developed; and then, at a random date sometime thereafter, they'd be thawed-out, shout tally-ho or whatever the in-pharse was by then, and beat the whole lot to pulp. Then they'd hide them under rocks and think of something else to do.

So - a date was chosen, the automatic-timer set, and they bade each other a chilly farewell -

Oh look - sometimes things crop up, OK, things we've no control over - I really can't say any more... I just can't... Just be patient with us for a wee bit longer, huh? Thanks. It's appreciated. What noise?
