Ah yes - the medieval wooden pig. Only a replica, of course, but an undoubted part, all the same, of Bristol's Dark History - and even if it seems hardly credible now that such barbaric devices could ever have been in common usage, it's still a fact that, throughout most of the Middle Ages, to be threatened with the wooden pig was enough to start even the most hardened sheep-stealer or insurgent peasant quaking in his clogs, pleading to be doused in hot oil, rolled in a barrel of cattle-dung, or flayed mercilessly with one of those long knobly sticks with leathery bits on the end like we've got upstairs - anything rather than be cast upon the wooden pig. And indeed, as I glance across at it now, newly installed in the children's play area, smiling its Mona Lisa smile while toddlers clamber innocently upon its broad polished back, I muss that it is, in many ways, a Trojan Pig, its happy hollow casing belying a wretched historical cargo.

I sometimes think SARAH's a bit Trojan too - the way we use popmusic to subtly smuggle our own political and personal agendas into your lives - such that one day, whilst merrily whistling the latest Heavenly number, perhaps, you'll be suddenly hit by the underlying sub-text and go scurrying to your textbooks in search of answers to the questions posed, questions like: feminism - yes or no? Anarcho-syndicalism - whose round is it anyway? Or, in the current case: Adam Ant - Punk Rocker or Pirate King?
