So, here we are then - SARAH 91, and the first in our latest series of 7" labels, a trip round Bristol Harbour, courtesy of the Bristol Ferry Boat Company (40 minutes on any boat, round-trip £1.80). We begin, sensibly enough, with the new landing-stage at Castle Green. The blue of the labels is supposed to symbolise water, incidentally - we mullied it over for a bit, and then decided blue was probably best, as well as being cheapest (see insert to SARAH 73 for a fuller discussion on the comparative costs of different colours). The surrounding black vinyl, of course, symbolises - as it always has done - the awful, incomprehensible darkness that lies "out there"; while the hole in the middle quietly serves to remind us of the dreadful aching emptiness that's there at the centre of all our lives, if only we could be honest with ourselves for once and not spend so much time getting drunk, picking up strangers and taking them home for a good time; it never ceases to amaze me how many people just slouch about grumbling that popmusic these days has nothing to say about their lives... when ALL THIS is contained within one little 7". I could go on - about how the cardboard sleeve reminds us of the way in which so many things, including people, appear outwardly bright and interesting and yet inside are completely dull and empty - while the plastic bag symbolises absolutely nothing at all - that's why it's see-through. And is thus, in its own way, most profound of all. The plastic bags come from Halifax, incidentally - not that I'm trying to make any big point here, I just thought you might like to know, because it's interesting.
