cut out and keep

Pulling away from the Castle Green landing-stage (see SARAH 91), we pass smoothly under Bristol Bridge and Redcliffe Bridge and come to our next berth at the entrance to Bathurst Basin, just outside the Ostrich, the Ostrich being a rather nice pub on the quayside with tables out beside the water and also a large flightless bird renowned for its huge eggs and childish sense of humour. Of more interest to regular readers, however, will be the big boat in the background, as this is the Thekla, home of the legendary Sarah Christmas Parties. The less nautically-inclined amongst you might be surprised to hear that, despite appearances, the boat is not in fact resting on the water surface, but actually extends quite a way under; this gives it stability and stops it tipping over. In much the same way that ostriches will often bury their heads in the ground for extra security even though it leaves them so vulnerable to being sneaked up on and pushed.

One other point: since starting this series, events have rather overtaken us and A NEW LANDING-STAGE has just been opened alongside Temple Meads station as part of the Quay Point Development. This new stage has direct pedestrian access to the platforms and so provides a relaxed fume-free route into the city-centre for commuters from Bath, Swindon or perhaps Yate. It also opens up new strategies to players of SAROPOLY - we'll include details of how to add it to your board in our next newsletter.
