We've now arrived at the top of St. Augustine's Reach - just below Neptune's statue and across the road from the Bristol & West's fine city-centre HQ, which at night is bathed in lovely cool blue-grey floodlighting but in the daytime isn't. This is actually as far as the ferry gets, as here the River Frome (along the canalised length of which we've been sailing) disappears underground, having been covered over years ago to make room for traffic. There are vague plans to uncover it again, and have a big quayside piazza by The Hippodrome, but I suspect nothing will come of it - there are too many cars. Of course, in an ideal world, private cars would be banned and we'd all ride round in properly subsidised buses, trains, trams and ferries. But we don't, alas, live in such a paradise, because people don't like paying taxes, because it means they can't buy so many records. I've just read a fanzine in which someone was complaining how SARAH began with all these grand punk-rock ideals but had since got sidetracked into... I forget what, but I'm sure I'm being symptomatic. And yet - I like to think that, even if the music doesn't always obey the rules and hang out in Camden Town playing third support to Linus and come out on 7" only (which most people don't actually want anyway) and do whatever else it is it's supposed to, then at least our attitude to public-transport still strikes just as much a rebel pose as The Clash, Orange Juice or Jasmine Minks ever did.
