cut out and keep

And now, having at last reached the entrance to Cumberland Basin, we heave to, and gaze back wide-eyed along the whole long length of the harbour as if to say, "Can we really have come so far?" Behind us stand the lock-gates, and beyond them the open river; and beyond the river is the sea, the great grey Atlantic; and across that vast ocean lies the New World, or America as we have to call it these days and - suddenly, once again, I am confounded by metaphots, or metaphors if I could type properly: for here we stand, brave mariners all, yet still we awkwardly turn our backs when confronted by the wild possibilities of the open sea, and seek instead the comfort and security of what we know - the hazy spires and misty towers of a pleasant, peaceful city in the west of England, a city that no-one really cares much about, that seldom makes the national headlines, and that still doesn't have a decent public-transport system despite us having complained about it in these inserts for years now which is (I might say) more than Massive Attack or Tricky or bloody Portishead have ever done, which is especially rich given how re-opening the line to Portishead is one of the main options and... um... somehow I just feel small, cowardly, and pointless. But I can't help it; for what if one never reached the Atlantic, what if adverse currents or winds drove one towards Newport or Barry Island or... Heck, I'm sure you know what I'm trying to say.
